TWO COMRADES IN ARMS.

From the California.
Comrade! I hear the beating of a drum,
ave reinforcements come?"
There is no sound save a soft whippoorwill
singing from yonder hill."

Comrade! I see a spacious mansion stand, built by my comrade's hand."

No honored ancestry have left a stone that may call my own.

Beside his heart my gentle lady warms
her slender limbs in her bosom's bower.
No tender wife upon her loving breast lays balm of mine to rest!"

See! how her bright hair falls in golden showers,
wined with crimson flowers."

No waving hair, by fragrant dovesets pressed,
as my rough hand caressed."

On what enchanted wings the swift time flies harm' by those heavenly eyes!

How "I" fly and how long the sad hours seem!—
I cannot dream."

Again I hear the beating of a drum:

"A True Story."

From the Evening Telegraph.

After I got the second wound, through my ankles, I crawled down to the edge of the river, under the bluff, and looked out for a chance to cover. But it was impossible. One of the last swimmers we had tried it, but after swimming some distance he came back and reported the current too strong. I knew then that escape was out of the question for me, so both ankles shot through and a bullet through my shoulder, so I lay quiet until it was over. A length the Rebels began creeping round, looking for such as were hidden under the river bank, and one of them, a powerful fellow, one of the largest men I ever saw, with a long black beard, came up to where I lay and ordered me to get up. I told him I was badly hurt in the ankles and could not walk.

The brute gave me three prods with his bayonet, in the back, ordering me to rise at each stab, could not, and he finally gave it up, and I was never to forget that man.

I had been captured, and I was not in a similar position.

Oh! it seemed to devolve on me to be revenged over that man, my master.

Well, it was time afterwards that he was exchanged, and had got well enough to do again, when one day I was ordered to conduct some Rebels to Fort Delaware.

Judge how my heart leaped when I recognized the tyrant who a few days before, and whom I had seen up at least once, was the worse for wear, and he was the downcast air that always hung over a brave man when he finds himself in the same predicament.

It was a cat which a captive mouse. I tell all the cruelty of his act to me, and in my heart I vowed that he should never reach Fort Delaware alive. I left the others to the care of my captor, and took the train to New York to charge myself. I had not lost him out of sight a moment. He did not betray the slightest collection of me, and I began to think that he did not recognize me at all.

I had been captured, and I had to think how should do it.

In the meantime he lay down on the deck and went to sleep. I had resolved to kill him when he was asleep, and the plan was made.
